Growth factor production by fetal and adult astrocytes in culture: comparison with induction of DNA synthesis. The synthesis of insulin-like growth factor-II (IGF-II) by human astrocytes in culture was examined. Unlike other growth factors such as platelet-derived growth factor (PDGF) and fibroblast growth factor (FGF), IGF-II was not detected in astrocyte-conditioned medium by radioimmunoassay (RIA) or immunocytochemistry, nor was IGF-II immunoreactivity detectable by immunofluorescence in the culture cells. Similarly, radioimmunoassays for PDGF and FGF were negative in astrocyte-conditioned medium. However, IGF-II gene expression could be demonstrated by Northern blotting and increased approximately tenfold upon treatment of the cells with phorbol myristate acetate (PMA). Human astrocytes derived from fetal (21-24 weeks of gestation) and adult (18-20 years of age) sources were used. The proliferation and differentiation of cultured astrocytes were assessed by measurement of cell density, protein content, and morphological changes by light microscopy. There was no difference in growth of astrocytes from the fetal and adult sources or between fetal and adult cells at all time points examined. The results presented here support the concept that in the absence of other mitogens, astrocytes produce a protein other than PDGF or FGF that induces DNA synthesis. This activity, which is induced by PMA, is present in fetal but not adult astrocytes. A short-term weather forecast for Mumbai is likely to be rain at some places. For rest of the 82157476af
