Q: Python: Does the first argument passed to a function get passed as the first argument in function calls? I don't mean passing the argument when calling the function: `def a_function(arg): print arg a_function('abc') # prints 'abc'` I am talking about Python functions that have arguments: `a_function(1) # prints 1` I found that when I call a function without specifying any arguments it behaves as though it receives the first argument. For example: `a_function() # prints 1` The behavior makes sense to me but not a complete one. What does Python do exactly when I call a function without specifying any arguments? Does it behave like the first argument is always the first argument passed, even when I do pass an argument? A: The default argument is always the first argument of the function. When a function is defined with a parameter (a keyword argument in the function call), this is the first argument to the function. For all other arguments (positional arguments), their order in the parameter list is the order in which they occur in the function call. This rule applies both to keyword and to positional arguments, including optional arguments.
